

Programmatic Competencies for the MPH in Health Promotion Sciences

In addition to the overall Master of Public Health degree core competencies, Health Promotion Science graduates will be able to:

- Understand the multiple social determinants of health based upon the social-ecological model;
- Conduct research needed to assess individual, community and societal needs for health promotion;
- Plan effective evidence-based health promotion programs grounded in social and behavioral science theory;
- Implement health promotion programs;
- Develop and conduct health promotion program evaluations;
- Communicate health promotion needs, concepts, concerns, and resources to relevant audiences;
- Apply appropriate research principles and methods in health promotion;
- Advance the profession of public health promotion and health promotion.